

Call for Papers:

Special Issue on 'Crisis in Policing' for the International Journal of Police Science

The International Journal of Police Science (IJPS) is seeking articles for a special issue examining “Crises in Policing.” Policing is currently faced with an interactive set of crises. These crises are often global in scope and have the potential to erode public trust and legitimacy of police and law enforcement agencies worldwide. Individual crises include police use of deadly force, police corruption and misconduct, police response to transnational organized crime and gangs. These issues are not country specific. Crises of policing are found in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Belgium, Australia, and elsewhere. The erosion of public trust is amplified by political division and the rise of authoritarian regimes.

The special issue editors are seeking submissions from practitioners and academics on these topics. IJPS serves a global audience and seeks case studies from throughout the world on these topics. The cases can involve both contemporary descriptions of crises, model responses (such a police-mental health co-response), empirical studies using both quantitative and qualitative data, historical analyses of past episodes of police crises (such as during the civil rights movement), and potential policy and legal responses.

For details on submissions see here.

For questions about the potential scope of articles contact the special issue editors via email: Dr. John P. Sullivan at globalwarning1@gmail.com or Dr. Nathan P. Jones at nxj008@shsu.edu.

Deadline:

- Abstract submissions (250-word max) to special issue editors: June 1, 2024
- Draft submissions for double anonymized peer review: October 1, 2024

See here for more information.